A Viking with the name Erik the Red was exiled from Iceland upon his conviction for murder. Hearing tales of land to the west, he set out with a boat full of men and supplies and found Greenland, where a settlement was established. Although the Viking settlements of Greenland didn't exactly thrive, they didn't disappear.

And the research also indicated that Viking identity wasn't something exclusive to Vikings themselves. Two skeletons found on Orkney, off the northeast coast of Scotland, which had DNA similar to modern-day Irish and Scottish people, were buried in Viking-style graves. This suggests they may have taken on Viking identities, researchers say.
